

NEW YORK POST

New York City’s fanciest offices are absolutely jaw-dropping

By Laura Itzkowitz

January 18, 2018 | 4:20pm | Updated

Remember that episode of “Mad Men” when Joan complains about people walking through her office as a shortcut? These days, Joan probably wouldn’t have her own office — and even Don Draper would have to share a cubicle.

Workplace design has been shifting toward open-plan layouts for years, with increasing emphasis on communal space and enticing amenities that just might make up for the lack of privacy. And with the old 9-to-5 long gone, employers are offering more perks to keep employees satisfied as they work longer hours.

J Public Relations chose Kelly Wearstler wallpaper for its Midtown hub. J Public Relations

With social media’s influence on the rise, employers increasingly turn to designers to kit out their spaces with Instagrammable interiors. J Public Relations’ office in Midtown’s Skylark Building features a millennial pink design by Casey DeBois and Esteban Interiors, with patterned wallpaper by Kelly Wearstler and artwork by Gray Malin.

